The North Carolina Botanical Garden is a center for research, conservation, and interpretation of plants, with special emphasis on plants native to the southeastern United States and horticultural plants having traditional uses or special botanical interest. Located on the US 15-501 Bypass at Old Mason Farm Road in Chapel Hill, the Garden is open Monday–Friday 8 am–5 pm, year-round. Weekend hours: June–August, Saturday 9 am–6 pm and Sunday 1–6 pm; September–May, Saturday 9 am–5 pm and Sunday 1–5 pm. March–November, a Daily Plant Sale offers NCBG-propagated native plants.
We hope the following information is helpful to gardeners who want to grow native plants without threatening natural populations. To the best of our knowledge, all nurseries listed here propagate their own plants. At the North Carolina Botanical Garden, we refer to conservation-oriented practices, such as propagating native plants (as opposed to collecting them from the wild), as conservation through propagation.

Conservation through propagation helps you and the environment by

- Supporting and encouraging ethical nursery growers;
- Assisting in the survival of native species in the wild by discouraging collection in our natural areas;
- Enhancing your garden with the beauty of nursery-propagated native plants, which are more likely to survive than transplants from the wild; and, thus
- Providing you with more value dollar for dollar.

The following list is by no means complete—we are always looking for additions. If you know of any nurseries that propagate native plants or offer seeds, please send name, address, phone, website, and comments on your direct experience, and if available, a copy of the catalog to:
